

Judge D.M. BREBNER

Editor's Farewell

This will be the last issue of the ACPC Journal to be prepared under the supervision of your editor of the last few years. I have asked the National Executive to find a replacement for me during the General Meeting to be held in conjunction with the Wollongong Conference.

The special value of the Australian Crime Prevention Council is, in my opinion, that it brings together people from so many different backgrounds and vocations with the common interest of reducing the incidence of crime. Membership of the Council helps us to realise that there is a part for each and every one of us to play if we are to attain our objective.

My recent role as editor of the Journal has been one that has been full of interest. It has brought me into contact, most pleasant contact, with many of our contributors and our members. It is, however, time that I allowed some other member this somewhat challenging privilege. I look forward to renewing the friendships that I have made at our conferences for many years to come.
