The Official Publication of the Law Society of the Northern Territory

Primed up & signed up

They're here. The first part of the Northern Territory Law Reports was on display at the official launch of the NTLRs last month. The Administrator, James Muirhead, officially launched the reports, recalling the days of only two judges in the Territory and a longing for authorised reports. Then, he said, there were three judges, and they longed for reports. His Honour said he had spoken with former Chief Justice,

Sir William Forster, who was delighted to hear that the NT now had its own report series. His Honour also paid tribute to the Law Book Company who "looked after the little people," a reference to the lack of massive profits involved in publishing the NTLRs. Justice Mildren told the gathering of practitioners that there was no such thing as a free drink, and the purpose of inviting practitioners to the launch was to prime them up and sign them up and indicated a table swamped with subscription forms. Photo spread on pages 6-7.
