

JOINT-USE LIBRARIES — DRAFT POLICY STATEMENT

VIDEO READERS of Incite will have followed with interest the correspondence on the pros and cons of joint-use libraries.

The Association's Executive Committee has discussed this issue and has formulated a draft policy statement.

This statement is published here so that you have an opportunity to comment on it, with the result that the policy statement eventually adopted will more accurately reflect the views of members.

Please send your comments on the draft statement to the Executive Director by 8 August 1980.

The LAA is conscious of the controversy which surrounds the issue of joint-use library services. Of special significance is the provision of library facilities shared between an education authority and a municipal authority. National, state and local government authorities, community groups and individuals have issued conflicting statements, have called for increased experimentation and have sought guidance on the matter. The Association therefore issues this statement on joint library services with the special reference to joint services involving educational institutions.

There is strong support for the case that the provision of separate library services is more advantageous to the clientele than the provision of a joint service.

Nevertheless there are occasions when a joint facility is justified as a suitable alternative in cases where library service is otherwise impossible. Small, isolated rural centres with little hope of a public library service because of their size or isolation is a case in point. Genuine community interest in sharing a comprehensive range of resources and facilities at the local level may also justify the provision of a joint library venture. Rapid growth zones of urban areas are often proposed as ideal ground for school/community libraries because of local council's inability to provide all community facilities in the initial stages of development; in the interests of giving library service to the local community, such temporary arrangements may be supported.

The Association acknowledges that there is growing pressure for the sharing of community facilities, particularly on economic grounds. However, the provision of joint services on the sole grounds of purported cost savings is not supported.

The Association urges that, when considering a joint library service, authorities take the following matters into account:

- * Consultation involving all the bodies involved is essential.
- * There must be agreement of all parties on conditions of provision, financing and use.
- * The site of the institution and the position of the library are critical factors; without ready access to all users the project is in jeopardy.
- * The library should be available to all clients during the institution's operating hours and adequate provision must be made for out-of-hours use, including vacations.

The Association does not offer definitive guidelines on other aspects of joint-use facilities, since local circumstances must dictate varying approaches. Rather it advises that authorities should consider all the implications of these projects, giving special attention to such issues as size of community, library space, staffing, availability of material, integration of collections and financial responsibility.

The Association acknowledges that joint-use libraries exist and that circumstances justify their provision, particularly in serving people who would otherwise be deprived of access and in specific experimental situations. It urges caution in the establishment of projects and thorough consultation prior to decisions being made. It stresses the need for proper evaluation of experimental schemes, for their documentation and the publication of outcomes. The Association is aware of the conflicting nature of the limited available literature on joint-use schemes and strongly urges authorities to disseminate widely any relevant documentation for the benefit of other interested parties.
