The Australian Software Houses Association claims that software is a product and as such should attract sales tax, but should be exempt in the same way as books, under the First Schedule of the Sales Tax (Exemptions and Classifications) Act. On the other hand, by being classified as a product it therefore is able to attract all the above-mentioned benefits and incentives.

In addition to the 17½ percent sales tax for sales within Australia, there is a 35 percent tariff on imported software.

All these factors add up to a potentially increasingly expensive product for the end-user if he is not a tax exempt body and they threaten the viability of some Australian software manufacturers especially if retrospective collection of the sales tax is imposed.

So, what is being done? The Australian Computer Services Association has suggested:

- slashing the price of software but making up the difference in a maintenance contract;
- offering membership of a software library to a purchaser of hardware;
- asking for the return of the media from which software is installed at the users' site.

A test case against the backdated sales tax has been mounted, using Melbourne firm DeForest Software. ASHA has begun a campaign to have the software industry recognised as a 'manufacturing industry'.

Victorian Senator John Siddons, has asked the Parliamentary counsel to draft a private member's bill to have software exempted from sales tax. So far this has been stalled by an inability to closely define 'software'.

The implications for libraries of all this activity are not at first obvious as many libraries are tax exempt institutions and may not be directly affected if sales tax is imposed on retail software from now on. However, if firms are to pay sales tax retrospectively the base cost of software packages is likely to have to be increased to cover the back taxes.

More insidious, though, is the potentially dangerous effect on the erstwhile successful fight to prevent books being subject to sales tax of the Chairman of ASHA's campaign tactics. He has requested in a letter to Senator Messner, that the Government decide on the applicability of the extension of the word 'goods' to include computer software. His argument includes the following points:

Computer software is not covered by any of the schedules because it has never been considered to be 'goods'.

If it is 'goods' then it is analogous to 'books' since it is primarily concerned with information transfer.

If it is 'goods' it should therefore be contained with the first schedule.

In the circumstances we therefore request: If software is goods, listing in the first schedule as exempt goods on the grounds of its importance not only as the legitimate heir to literature but also as a significant Australian industry in own right.

The attitude that software is 'the legitimate heir to literature' has been echoed by an editorial in Australasian Computerworld, 9 July, which claims that 'Reproducing copies of such software can hardly be distinguished from printing books as an industrial activity, as evidenced by the number of source programs reproduced in magazines'.

If the ASHA campaign is successful in linking the production of software with the production of 'goods' the software houses will gain, irrespective of whether or not software is classed as sales tax exempt goods. If it is not classed as sales tax exempt goods, the claimed connection with book publishing and the claimed genetic link with literature will provide a strong case for resurrecting the Government's intention to place a sales tax on books.

Another interesting effect could be in the area of software copyright — if the connection with books is established, it is likely that the thorny question of copyright of software will have to be examined in yet another light.

Whatever the result of the ASHA campaign the effect will be felt in all libraries and the campaign should be closely scrutinised by the LAA for its possible impact on libraries and on the book trade.
