

VITAL INFORMATION

What have librarians, market gardeners, engineers and nurses got in common? People working in these occupations would get priority for medical resources in civil defence planning in the event of a nuclear war, it has been suggested.

At a symposium for the Prevention of Nuclear War held in Madrid recently, Mr John Dawson, head of the professional, scientific and international affairs division of the British Medical Association spoke about a working party that has been set up to examine the issue of who should be treated by the limited medical services trying to cope after a nuclear war. Treatment would be denied to people with chronic conditions, or who would need continuing care, and to people incapable of leading an independent or productive existence.

Those listed as being selected for special treatment include, of course, children — and the kinds of people whose skills would be vital in rebuilding the community.

Which is where librarians came in, because as Mr Dawson said ‘... you must have access to all the information you can lay your hands on ...’
