ACIN — sharing the goodies

For a number of years people working in schools have recognised that one of the offshoots of school-based curriculum development has been a plethora of curriculum materials such as school-based programs, units of work, program outlines, and teacher development material as well as syllabus and policy statements produced by departments of education. Much of this material is of interest to an audience wider than originally intended, but previously no mechanism existed for the retrieval of, or access to, this information.

In an attempt to enable the sharing of curriculum developments between schools, states and systems the Schools Commission and state/territory departments of education have undertaken the establishment of a curriculum database, the Australian Curriculum Information Network (ACIN). It is available through ASCIS (the Australian Schools Catalogue Information Network). Each state collects and enters records for their own publications and documents. The records include bibliographic data and an abstract describing its purpose, content, and applicability to the curriculum. The initial areas for collecting materials include education; Australian studies; computer education; education of girls; nursery and literacy and peace education. Information about materials in other curriculum areas is gradually being added.

Overall development of ACIN is facilitated by a management committee which includes the national co-ordinator and representatives from the Schools Commission, state/territory directors of curriculum and Catholic and Independent school systems. The states and territories each have their own co-ordinator who meet periodically to make recommendations on selection of material, data entry and other technical matters.

The database is being made available to schools in a variety of ways. Schools can access the database either online through ASCIS or through a microfiche subscription service. In New South Wales ACIN is being combined with NCIN, the NSW Curriculum Information Network, in order to provide NSW schools with access to documents of more local interest. A similar approach is being taken in South Australia.

Access to the documents referred to in the database was a major consideration in establishing the ACIN. All abstracts include information about availability. Several states are making many of their curriculum documents available on microfiche so that requests can be met quickly and inexpensively.

For further information about ACIN contact the co-ordinator in each state/territory education department, or the National ACIN Office, Level 6, Rialto Towers, 525 Collins Street, Melbourne 3000.
