

the front line

It had been minus something degrees overnight; the sun was weak; the wind cut. The sloping tussocked paddock was softening to frost-wetness as we sought and traced its boundary. We stopped. I mused. Would anyone, to paraphrase Dr Johnson on another, distant, capital ever declare 'when a man is tired of Canberra he is tired of life, for there is in Canberra all that life can afford'? Perhaps not.

We? The writer and Past President Ian McCallum. The place? A lightly treed paddock but four minutes from that bunkered flagpole on Capital Hill. And just why were your hardy representatives confronting, at 8.00 am, the rigours of Canberra in winter?

In August last year the Darwin AGM resolved on a feasibility study on the relocation of our Association's Head Office to the National Capital. A three-person working party convened by Mike Andrews, General Treasurer, with Ian McCallum and myself as the other members has been working on this study. We have consulted the Association's banker; 376 Jones Street, Ultimo has been valued; discussions with other national associations who are relocating to Canberra have been held; property and leasing agents in Canberra have been visited; we have talked with the National Capital Development Commission; the Association's assets and liabilities have been reviewed. The result is that the relocation of a major part of our Sydney based Head Office to Canberra in the near future is looking distinctly feasible and even financially advantageous in the longer term.

That paddock? The Commonwealth has reserved a fairly small area adjacent to the Mint in West Deakin for national associations. We 'missed out' on the first release. In the second and adjacent release, thanks primarily to the actions of Jenny Adams and Ian McCallum, we are one of nine associations that has paid $1000 to secure a site.

Discussions with property agents have confirmed that these sites, because of their closeness to the centre of Canberra and attractive outlook on the Brindabella Ranges, are prime real estate at a bargain price. We will be asked this month or next for our site preference. The sites will be serviced late in 1988 and we will be required to start building soon thereafter. John Metcalfe House, National Office of the Australian Library and Information Association, could be ready in 1989.

The question is, should it be? Should we, ironically, return to where we began just 50 years ago this month? Should we join those national associations who have already moved, or are proposing to move to Canberra?

Let's consider one national association which is moving, from Melbourne, to Canberra. The Australian College of Education is not dissimilar to us; but is not as large, nor are its assets as substantial. Despite this, and the need to enter into a joint venture to do so, ACE is relocating for reasons which are dominated by the following:

- the symbolic aspects of a credible national association being in the National Capital
- access to the Commonwealth bureaucracy
- opportunity to construct a purpose-designed building to last 50 years.

In effect ACE has asked itself where, as we approach the 21st century, should an effective national association have its focus? It is to this simple question we should respond. It is not a question of the logistic and communication merits in 1987 of one city against another; it is not a question of climate, the sociology of a created capital, or the possible loss of valued staff; it is not a question of the short-term difficulties of relocation; it should not be a question responded to by self-interest. The debate should rather be about where our Association is best placed to meet the challenges of the rest of this century and the next; and if that place is the National Capital, whether relocation is feasible, that is 'capable of being done, effected, or accomplished'. (Macquarie).

The issue is thus not peripheral to members, the majority, who live outside Sydney or Canberra itself. It is not peripheral because where and how we accommodate ourselves is a fundamental measure of our self-esteem, confidence and assertiveness as a national association; it is on that we are in turn valued; and it is on that valuation that we will gain, or lose, support for the development of the library network of this nation.

A colleague, on hearing the above account, remarked 'Surely it's inevitable that we do decide to move to Canberra this time'. I retorted that no, nothing in a democratic organisation such as ours, is, or should be, inevitable — and that is the case.

What is absolutely certain, though, is that we will be required to decide very soon on whether we are to build on that paddock in West Deakin. If we decide no we lose $1000 and the last opportunity to construct a purpose-designed building close to the centre of our National Capital.

Tangible but not, in the short term, critical.

BOOK REVIEW

Information Consulting in Australia: a practical approach. Proceedings of a Seminar held in Melbourne, 28 February 1986. Edited by Jennifer Goddard, Marion Dormer and Helen Campbell. Published by the Information Management and Consulting Association, Melbourne, 1986.

This collection of papers is a goldmine of tips, how-to's, and valuable information for the information consultant. I recommend it to anyone who is thinking of becoming an information consultant, or to those who are simply curious to find out more about the cut and thrust of small business. The papers are without exception interesting reading and will be an eye-opener to all information professionals. Some of it may seem a little aggressive to those involved in 'traditional' librarianship, unused to the hard sell world of small business, but it does give an idea of the challenges those businesses face. The papers are given by an interesting mix of people, some of whom are information consultants themselves.

Information is a service oriented profession, and information professionals are accustomed to giving away their product — information. It is quite difficult to put a value on your time, expertise and products. The hardest part of the business is telling someone how much it will cost, and then getting them to pay. For someone conditioned to be of service, it is very difficult to respond to a quick request for information with a quote. We should learn from the computer consultants, who are very good at charging for their services. Meg Paul and Jenn Evans (Freelance Library & Information Services) give some excellent advice on preparing cost estimates. One comment that disturbed me in their paper was 'it is helpful if you have a partner with a steady income or if you have a part-time position which allows you to work for yourself the rest of the week.' It is unfortunate that business tends to come in bursts but I suspect there are very few men who would go into business unless they thought they could support themselves and their families from it. While it may be difficult at first to charge realistically for one's services, this must be learned if clients are to value these services — now and in the future.

Stephen Carthew is the Co-ordinator of the Centre for the Development of Entrepreneurs at Chisholm Institute of Technology. His paper defined an entrepreneur as someone who turns visions into business ventures. He says they do it by planning, and he describes the stages in compiling a business plan. Those stages include describing the service you are offering, who is going to pay for the service, developing a market strategy, (he prefers the term 'sales'), an operations strategy and a financial strategy.

Leigh Baker spoke from the interesting perspective of an 'entrepreneur', or an entrepreneur within a corporate structure. His paper gave a good solid business approach to developing a market strategy in terms of the business plan, the products and the selling methods, something librarians should know much more about before going into business for themselves.

Helen Campbell, (Campbell Information Consultants), an independent information consultant herself, gave a great wrap up of the seminar, its speakers and its themes. She gave a very perceptive analysis of potential markets for information services. Her paper makes fascinating reading, and its value is enhanced by the bibliography included.

While it is all very well to consider the benefits, and there are many, the legal and taxation aspects of small business must be considered carefully before taking the plunge. These are well covered by Moira Paterson, a solicitor in private practice specialising in conveyancing, small business law and FOI. The perils of business are perhaps best illustrated by Eleanor Whelan's paper. At the time, Eleanor was a Director of Triad/Infoquest, one of the oldest commercial information consultancies. Her paper not only gave an insight into day-to-day operations, it gave a good overall perspective. Since the paper was presented, however, Triad/Infoquest has changed considerably. June Anderson, of the Infoquest side, has taken a lecturing position at RMIT and Eleanor is free-lancing. Liz Osborn, the remaining Director, will continue to market and support INMAGIC software, but will not be undertaking any more general consultancy.

I learned a great deal from reading all of the papers included in this work, and recommend it wholeheartedly to anyone tempted to try and build a business out of information management. It may discourage you, it may inspire you. If it inspires you, then you have in this work a good manual to help build a sound, profitable business. I wish I had seen it a couple of years ago.

What we might also lose however, will concentrate the minds of your elected representatives on General Council when they meet in September. The meeting is in Canberra, that city of 'wide embassies of spring autumn'. A place, indeed, to celebrate 50 years.

Alas, I shall have to substitute the glorious Indian summer awaiting the British Isles after the IFLA Conference in Brighton. IFLA ... now there's another capital 'Frontline' topic ... for 1988?
